The Biggest Lie

Do you think it is relevant to our mainstream subjects in school to discuss how people can affect each other's feelings? Why or why not? If not, should we discuss this in other classes?

In your teaching, have you come across students who seem to have had a bad start in life? What did you do with them? How were you most able to help them?

Are teachers and students powerless to decide how much testing and pressure to exert in school? If not, what is one thing you can share that you have done.

How does the way you relate to yourself impact your connection to your students? Can you imagine how this might be shifted to improve that connection?
